body, the Senate, will undergo only partial rejuvenation as relegislatures. Whatever the out- and start the wheels turning come may be in the legislative election, the political complexion of the Senate cannot be changed.

It is possible, however, to install a Democratic majority in the House, if the voters of the land temporarly take their eyes off the gun and abate the interest in public questions which they have shown for the past five Congressional elections.

The Democrats have not had control of the House since the Fifty-third Congress. The next Congres will be the Fifty-ninth and during all that period the voters have steadfastly insisted upon the republicans retaining the majority and directing the policies of Government. And why? The answer is simple, because at each recurring election, the Democratic party stood for some policy or political principle which the mass of the people would not approve and because by the same token the republican party's programme of Government was acceptable to the mass of the thinking people. The House of Representatives is the direct exponent of the people.

It is easy to trace, election by election, the reasoning of the voters compelling their action at the ballot box and which resulted in republican majorities in the House. It was the Fiftythird Congress that passed the disastrous Wilson tariff act, which in such a brief period of time brought such woful disaster to the industries of the country. Men did not have to be statesmen or economists to trace the relation between cause and ef-
